Back in 1971, Michael O’Flaherty (Goodspeed’s Resident Music Director) co-founded, along with the late Jane Simon Miller, a community theater called Genesius in Reading, Pennsylvania. Michael was in his early twenties, and I was just thirteen years old when I found my way to this very special theater that opened its arms to young people, encouraging them to explore every facet of musical theatre. This was the beginning of a life-long friendship. In later years, a second theatrical collaboration evolved when I talked Michael into writing a musical about Genesius’ fabled early days, called, appropriately, GENESIUS, The Musical. The show was presented in 2007 at Goodspeed’s Festival of New Musicals and was subsequently showcased in New York City the following summer.

Michael and I were not writers by trade, although we had dabbled in the process throughout the years. But after GENESIUS, we had caught the “creating-bug” and wanted to write something else. I had been the Artistic Director at Genesius Theatre for over a decade, and I was just thirteen years old when I found my way to this very special theater that opened its arms to young people, encouraging them to explore every facet of musical theatre. This was the beginning of a life-long friendship. In later years, a second theatrical collaboration evolved when I talked Michael into writing a musical about Genesius’ fabled early days, called, appropriately, GENESIUS, The Musical. The show was presented in 2007 at Goodspeed’s Festival of New Musicals and was subsequently showcased in New York City the following summer.

Approximately four years ago, Michael mentioned that Goodspeed was looking for a holiday production to call their own, and I jumped right on that and suggested that we take the coveted Dickens’ tale and transplant our Pennsylvania Dutch version of the musical to Central Connecticut—Hartford/East Haddam. We decided to set the show on the stage of the Goodspeed Opera House in 1925. The premise is that Mr. Goodspeed himself has requested that legendary Connecticut actor and original Sherlock Holmes (and hometown boy) William Gillette play Scrooge in a final production of A Christmas Carol before the Opera House is shuttered for good. After doing extensive research, I discovered that the brilliant writer Harriet Beecher Stowe, the great showman P.T. Barnum, and satirist Mark Twain not only lived in Central Connecticut at one time, but they all knew each other and were also friendly with William Gillette. So, in this salute to the Nutmeg State, they become the pesky Spirits—past, present, and future—who visit Scrooge on that fateful Christmas Eve. To add to the fun, J.P. Morgan, the influential Hartford financier, visits Scrooge as the musical’s new version of Jacob Marley. All the other classic Dickens’ characters are on hand, too, such as Bob Cratchit, Tiny Tim, Scrooge’s nephew Harry, and his sister Jen, to name a few.

Taking a page from the late, great Broadway librettist Peter Stone’s theatrical playbook (1776, Titanic), I appropriated Gillette’s, Stowe’s, Barnum’s, and Twain’s humorous and often thought-provoking quotations. I stitched them together throughout the scenes so their sage advice and comedic mockery of old Scrooge, entwined with Michael’s inspiring music and lyrics, make for a lighthearted, amusing, and very special holiday experience! And now, we are both truly looking forward to assessing your reactions to this customized storyline and fully digesting your localized “Nutmegger” input, which will certainly add another layer of Connecticut-ian whimsy and Christmas merriment to this time-honored classic.

Thinking long term, Michael and I have high hopes that this magical Christmas story will become a tradition at Goodspeed and be presented annually for many Decembers to come. However, since “the gift is the present,” it’s our sincerest wish that you and all of Connecticut embrace our new version of A Christmas Carol that features this great state and the wonderful people in it, as we hope you make this your newest holiday tradition!
